

Regex

In this lecture we're going to talk about pattern matching in strings using regular expressions. Regular expressions, or regexes, are written in a condensed formatting language. In general, you can think of a regular expression as a pattern which you give to a regex processor with some source data. The processor then parses that source data using that pattern, and returns chunks of text back to the a data scientist or programmer for further manipulation. There's really three main reasons you would want to do this - to check whether a pattern exists within some source data, to get all instances of a complex pattern from some source data, or to clean your source data using a pattern generally through string splitting. Regexes are not trivial, but they are a foundational technique for data cleaning in data science applications, and a solid understanding of regexes will help you quickly and efficiently manipulate text data for further data science application.

Now, you could teach a whole course on regular expressions alone, especially if you wanted to demystify how the regex parsing engine works and efficient mechanisms for parsing text. In this lecture I want to give you basic understanding of how regex works - enough knowledge that, with a little directed sleuthing, you'll be able to make sense of the regex patterns you see others use, and you can build up your practical knowledge of how to use regexes to improve your data cleaning. By the end of this lecture, you will understand the basics of regular expressions, how to define patterns for matching, how to apply these patterns to strings, and how to use the results of those patterns in data processing.

Finally, a note that in order to best learn regexes you need to write regexes. I encourage you to stop the video at any time and try out new patterns or syntax you learn at any time.

In [1]: # First we'll import the re module, which is where python stores regular exp

In [2]: # There are several main processing functions in re that you might use. The
that is at the beginning of the string and returns a boolean. Similarly, s # anywhere in the string, and returns a boolean.

Lets create some text for an example
text = "This is a good day."

Now, lets see if it's a good day or not:
if re.search("good", text): # the first parameter here is the pattern print("Wonderful!") else:
    print("Alas :(")
```

Wonderful!

In [3]: # In addition to checking for conditionals, we can segment a string. The word # tokenizing, where the string is separated into substrings based on patterns # in natural language processing, which we won't talk much about here but that's # The findall() and split() functions will parse the string for us and return a list text = "Amy works diligently. Amy gets good grades. Our student Amy is successful."
This is a bit of a fabricated example, but lets split this on all instances of re.split("Amy", text)

Out[3]: ['',
' works diligently. ',
' gets good grades. Our student ',
' is successful.']

In [4]: # You'll notice that split has returned an empty string, followed by a number of # elements of a list. If we wanted to count how many times we have talked about Amy, re.findall("Amy", text)
```

Out[4]: ['Amy', 'Amy', 'Amy']

In [5]: # Ok, so we've seen that .search() looks for some pattern and returns a boolean # pattern for creating a list of substrings, and that .findall() will look for all # occurrences.

In [6]: # Now that we know how the python regex API works, lets talk about more complex # specification standard defines a markup language to describe patterns in text # Anchors specify the start and/or the end of the string that you are trying to find # means start and the dollar sign character $ means end. If you put ^ before a # the regex processor retrieves must start with the string you specify. For example
character after the string, it means that the text Regex retrieves must end with # Here's an example
Lets see if this begins with Amy
re.search("^Amy", text)
```

Out[6]: <re.Match object; span=(0, 3), match='Amy'>

In [7]: # Notice that re.search() actually returned to us a new object, called re.Match # always has a boolean value of True, as something was found, so you can always check # as we did earlier. The rendering of the match object also tells you what pattern
the word Amy, and the location the match was in, as the span.

Patterns and Character Classes

In [8]: # Let's talk more about patterns and start with character classes. Let's create a # grades over a semester in one course across all of their assignments grades="ACAAAABCBABAA"

If we want to answer the question "How many B's were in the grade list?" we re.findall("B",grades)

Out[8]: ['B', 'B', 'B']

In [9]: # If we wanted to count the number of A's or B's in the list, we can't use " # all A's followed immediately by a B. Instead, we put the characters A and re.findall("[AB]",grades)

Out[9]: ['A', 'A', 'A', 'A', 'A', 'B', 'B', 'B', 'A', 'A']

In [10]: # This is called the set operator. You can also include a range of character # alphanumerically. For instance, if we want to refer to all lower case lett
a simple regex to parse out all instances where this student receive an A re.findall("[A][B-C]",grades)

Out[10]: ['AC', 'AB']

In [11]: # Notice how the [AB] pattern describes a set of possible characters which c # [A][B-C] pattern denoted two sets of characters which must have been match
this pattern by using the pipe operator, which means OR
re.findall("AB|AC",grades)

Out[11]: ['AC', 'AB']

In [12]: # We can use the caret with the set operator to negate our results. For inst
the grades which were not A's re.findall("[^A]",grades)

Out[12]: ['C', 'B', 'C', 'B', 'C', 'B']

In [13]: # Note this carefully – the caret was previously matched to the beginning of # inside of the set operator the caret, and the other special characters we # meaning. This can be a bit confusing. What do you think the result would b
re.findall("^A",grades)

Out[13]: []

In [14]: # It's an empty list, because the regex says that we want to match any value # which is not an A. Our string though starts with an A, so there is no match # using the set operator you are doing character-based matching. So you are # an OR method.

Quantifiers

In [15]: # Ok, so we've talked about anchors and matching to the beginning and end of # characters and using sets with the [] notation. We've also talked about ch
| character allows us to or operations. Lets move on to quantifiers.

In [16]: # Quantifiers are the number of times you want a pattern to be matched in or # quantifier is expressed as e{m,n}, where e is the expression or character
number of times you want it to be matched, and n is the maximum number of times

Let's use these grades as an example. How many times has this student been re.findall("A{2,10}",grades) # we'll use 2 as our min, but ten as our max

Out[16]: ['AAAA', 'AA']

In [17]: # So we see that there were two streaks, one where the student had four A's,
A's

We might try and do this using single values and just repeating the pattern
re.findall("A{1,1}A{1,1}",grades)

Out[17]: ['AA', 'AA', 'AA']

In [18]: # As you can see, this is different than the first example. The first pattern # of two A's up to ten A's in a row. So it sees four A's as a single streak.
two A's back to back, so it sees two A's followed immediately by two more # processor begins at the start of the string and consumes variables which means # It's important to note that the regex quantifier syntax does not allow you # pattern. In particular, if you have an extra space in between the braces you
re.findall("A{2, 2}",grades)
```

Out[18]: []

In [19]: # And as we have already seen, if we don't include a quantifier then the default
re.findall("AA",grades)

Out[19]: ['AA', 'AA', 'AA']

In [20]: # Oh, and if you just have one number in the braces, it's considered to be the same
re.findall("A{2}",grades)

Out[20]: ['AA', 'AA', 'AA']

In [21]: # Using this, we could find a decreasing trend in a student's grades
re.findall("A{1,10}B{1,10}C{1,10}",grades)

Out[21]: ['AAAABC']

In [22]: # Now, that's a bit of a hack, because we included a maximum that was just a # other quantifiers that are used as short hand, an asterisk * to match 0 or # match one or more times, or a + plus sign to match one or more times. Lets # and load some data scraped from wikipedia
with open("datasets/ferpa.txt","r") as file:
    # we'll read that into a variable called wiki

Out[22]: 'Overview[edit]\nFERPA gives parents access to their child's education records, an opportunity to seek to have the records amended, and some control over the disclosure of information from the records. With several exceptions, schools must have a student's consent prior to the disclosure of education records after that student is 18 years old. The law applies only to educational agencies and institutions that receive funds under a program administered by the U.S. Department of Education.\n\nOther regulations under this act, effective starting January 3, 2012, allow for greater disclosures of personal and directory student identifying information and regulate student IDs and e-mail addresses.[2] For example, schools may provide external companies with a student's personally identifiable information without the student's consent.[2]\n\nExamples of situations affected by FERPA include school employees divulging information to anyone other than the student about the student's grades or behavior, and school work posted on a bulletin board with a grade. Generally, schools must have written permission from the parent or eligible student in order to release any information from a student's education record.\n\nThis privacy policy also governs how state agencies transmit testing data to federal agencies, such as the Education Data Exchange Network.\n\nThis U.S. federal law also gave students 18 years of age or older, or students of any age if enrolled in any post-secondary educational institution, the right of privacy regarding grades, enrollment, and even billing information unless the school has specific permission from the student to share that specific type of information.\n\nFERPA also permits a school to disclose personally identifiable information from education records of an "eligible student" (a student age 18 or older or enrolled in a post secondary institution at any age) to his or her parents if the student is a "dependent student" as that term is defined in Section 152 of the Internal Revenue Code. Generally, if either parent has claimed the student as a dependent on the parent's most recent income tax statement, the school may non-consensually disclose the student's education records to both parents.[3]\n\nThe law allowed students who apply to an educational institution such as a graduate school permission to view recommendations submitted by others as part of the application. However, on standard application forms, students are given the option to waive this right.\n\nFERPA specifically excludes employees of an educational institution if they are not students.\n\nThe act is also referred to as the Buckley Amendment, for one of its proponents, Senator James L. Buckley of New York.\n\nAccess to public records[edit]\n\nThe citing of FERPA to conceal public records that are not "educational" in nature has been widely criticized, including by the act's primary Senate sponsor.[4] For example, in the Owasso Independent School District v. Falvo case, an important part of the debate was determining the relationship between peer-grading and "education records" as defined in FERPA. In the Court of Appeals, it was ruled that students placing grades on the work of other students made such work into an "education record." Thus, peer-grading was determined as a violation of FERPA privacy policies because students had access to other students' academic performance without full consent.[5] However, when the case went to the Supreme Court, it was officially ruled that peer-grading was not a violation of FERPA. This is because a grade written on a student's work does not become an "education record" until the teacher writes the final grade into a grade book.[6]\n\nStudent medical records[edit]\n\nLegal experts have debated the issue of whether student medical records (for example records of therapy sessions with a therapist at an on-campus counseling center) might be released to the school administration under certain triggering events, such as when a student sued his college or university.[7][8]\n\nUsually, student medical treatment records will remain under the protection of FERPA, not the Health Insurance Portability and Accountabil ity Act (HIPAA). This is due to the "FERPA Exception" written within HIPAA.

This lecture has been an overview of regular expressions, and really, we've just scratched the surface of what you can do. Now, I actually find regex's really frustrating - they're incredibly powerful, but if you don't use them for a while you're left grasping for memory of some of the details, especially named groups and look ahead searches. But, there are lots of great examples and reference guides on the web, including the python documentation for regex, and with these in hand you should be able to write concise and readable code which performs well too. Having basic regex literacy is a core skill for applied data scientists.
